caspase-1 ===== Elevated production of ROS is associated with increased production of nucleic acids. The nucleic acid sensors TLR3 and TLR9 recognize viral ssRNA and dsRNA. TLR3 induces production of TNF- $\alpha$  and IFN- $\alpha/\beta$ , and a recent report has indicated that ligand recognition of TLR3 by dsRNA induces caspase-1-dependent processing of proIL-1 $\beta$ . TLR9, in contrast, induces production of type I interferon and IL-12p70. Caspase-1 activation, and the subsequent production of IL-1 $\beta$  are more dependent on the inflammasome than either TLR3 or TLR9 ([@bib205], [@bib206]). Several studies have suggested that caspase-1-deficient animals show reduced production of IL-1 $\beta$ . Although the mechanism by which this occurs has not been thoroughly investigated, the reduction in IL-1 $\beta$  has been associated with the inability of caspase-1-deficient cells to form the inflammasome complex and induce pyroptosis ([@bib206], [@bib207]). Recent studies have shown that caspase-1 processing of proIL-1 $\beta$  is dependent on the activity of ICE-inhibitory protein (ICER) that resides in mitochondria. The interaction between ICER and proIL-1 $\beta$  results in the release of proIL-1 $\beta$  in a non-caspase-1-dependent manner ([@bib208]). This release is accompanied by mitochondrial depolarization, production of ROS, and the release of cytochrome c. Once cytochrome c is released, it stimulates release of proapoptotic factors, such as proIL-1 $\beta$ , from the mitochondria into the cytosol. It has been speculated that pyroptosis, a mechanism by which cells die by caspase-1-dependent intracellular synthesis of IL-1 $\beta$ , may be another form of cell death that is involved in the pathogenesis of autoimmune diseases ([@bib209], [@bib210]). Conclusions {#s10} ===== Although the role of caspases in the pathogenesis of autoimmune diseases was initially thought to be apoptosis-inducing, accumulating evidence suggests that caspases are also critical players in inflammation, in vit
